In their article “Why the silence of moderate conservatives is dangerous for race relations,” Political Science Professors Christopher S. Parker and Megan Ming Francis explain why racism continues to haunt us today. Drawing a direct comparison between American race relations in the 1960s and today, Parker and Francis argue that “moderate conservatives [need] to take a bold stand” to combat today's racial injustices. Otherwise, they embolden vocal white reactionaries. The piece was published on TheConversation.com on August 10, 2015.

The Conversation is a collaborative effort among academics in a wide spectrum of fields to provide informed news analysis and commentary that is free to read and republish. The Conversation launched in Australia in March 2011, in the UK in May 2013, and in the United States in October 2014 as an independent news source that allows the research community and the public to engage with one another directly. The aim of the project is to rebuild trust in journalism, to increase the quality of public discourse, and to promote better understanding of current affairs and complex issues.

Join the conversation about Parker and Francis’ article!

People Involved: Christopher Sebastian Parker  Megan Ming Francis
News Category: Faculty and Staff

Letter from a Birmingham Jail - 1963