Asian 201 – Literature and Culture of China: Ancient and Classical (5 credits)
MW 1:30-3:20
Instructor: William Boltz
In this course, students will learn about important ideas from Buddhism, Taoism, and Confucianism, and how they shape the concept of a moral person in Asia. Iconic figures will be introduced through literature and film. For example, we will look at Confucius’ teachings by reading the Analects and watch a modern day movie about him. We will discuss the paradox of wen (cultural refinement) and wu (raw power), and the choice an educated person has to make between the word and the sword to solve a problem or resolve a conflict. Additionally, we will explore fascinating questions regarding cultural exchange and knowledge transmission among Asian countries and regions such as, how did an Indian child god become popular in China? How did a Chinese court lady married to a Xiongnu chieftain for peace-making gain eminence in Japan?
Asian 206 – Modern Literature of South Asia (5 credits)

Instructor: Annegret Oehme
Diversity credit; writing credit
No seniors period I registration.
Literary texts are important evidence for social difference (gender, race, class, ethnicity, language, citizenship status, sexuality, ability) in contemporary and historical contexts. Examines texts that encourage and provoke us to ask larger questions about identity, power, privilege, society, and the role of culture in present-day or historical settings.

ENGL 308 – Marxism and Literary Theory (5 credits)
This course introduces several key works by Marx and his collaborator, Engels, and the debates that have grown up around them. At the center of the course is the question of how 19th century writings about political economy (aka economics), history, and philosophy were taken up by 20th century literary scholars, and how a distinct tradition of interpreting literature and culture from a Marxist perspective, using Marxist tools, has developed over time and endured into the present. By contrast to other models of literary and cultural criticism which often seek to find in literary texts transcendent messages and universal meanings, Marxist theory has sought to situate literary and cultural texts within their historical contexts of production and reception, to understand the power dynamics (including dynamics informed by race, gender, and class conflict) that shape textual meaning, and to understand how such conflicts impact meaning, message, genre, style, and form.

Our study of Marxist theory will involve us in close, intensive reading of dense philosophical texts. We will also seek to understand how a materialist method indebted to Marxism has emerged as a dominant method within contemporary scholarship, and how diverse critical practices (often given such labels as “critical theory,” “feminist theory,” “critical race theory,” and “cultural studies”) are situated within a Marxist analytical tradition. Over the course of the quarter we will engage two cultural texts—one filmic and one literary. We will consider how our understanding of each is shaped by the Marxist frameworks that the course explores, and how each, in turn, may be used to reveal the (in)adequacy of Marxist methodologies.

Engl 319 – African Literatures (5 credits)
MW 2:30-4:20
Instructor: Laura Chrisman
Diversity credit
Open to all students on 3/2.
Introduces and explores African literatures from a range of regions. Pays particular attention to writings connected with the historical experiences of colonialism, anti-colonial resistance, and decolonization. Considers the operations of race, gender, nationhood, neocolonialism, and globalization within and across these writings.

Engl 352 – American Literature: The Early Nation (5 credits)
MW 6:30-8:20pm
Instructor: Robert Abrams
Open to all students on 3/2.
An introduction to American literature and culture during the decades leading up to the Civil War. This is a period which: 1) struggled with numerous issues of race, slavery, gender, and class; 2) strove to develop a national mythology and identity against the backdrop of shifting national boundaries, increasing immigration, worldwide empire and trade, and a heterogeneous population; 3) tried to salvage religious faith in the wake of modern science and the Enlightenment; 4) and took democracy seriously enough to trace through its implications even to the point where, as in the case of Walt Whitman’s Leaves of Grass, such implications start to become startling and strange. The period is much too complex to be organized into a dominant, easily defined thesis or polemic, and in fact the aesthetic strategy of choice for many of the writers whom we’ll be exploring is the ambiguous interchange of perspectives and voices without closure or synthesis. The “question,” as Melville at one point writes of his own literary method, tends to remain “more final than any answer.” Nature itself, as Thoreau emphasizes, becomes a site where perspectives so alter and shift and we can never get any closer than “nearer and nearer to here.” Pre-Civil War literary language in the U.S., I should caution, is dense, complicated, and often difficult to read—although enormously rewarding and eloquent—and students enrolling in this course should be prepared for encountering difficult language, and for reading it closely and carefully, as they explore authors such as Emerson and Melville.

Engl 368 – Women Writers (5 credits)
TTh 1:30-3:20
Instructor: Sydney Kaplan
Diversity credit
Open to all students on 3/2.
Investigates how perceptions of “woman writer” shape understandings of women’s literary works and the forms in which they compose. Examines texts by women writers with attention to sociocultural, economic, and political context. Considers gender as a form of social difference as well as power relationships.
structured around gender inequality.

Engl 479 – Language Variation and Language Policy in North America (5 credits)
MW 2:30-4:20
Instructor: Gail Stygall
Diversity credit
Open to all students on 3/2.
Surveys basic issues of language variation: phonological, syntactic, semantic, and narrative/discourse differences among speech communities of North American English; examines how language policy can affect access to education, the labor force, and political institutions.

Levant. Explores ancient Near Eastern taxonomies and functions of gender and sexuality, and examines social, political and religious forces that inform and construct gendered categories of gods, humans, and their worlds. Prerequisite: No prerequisites; recommended: NEAR E 201, Introduction to the Ancient Near East.

Near E 325 – Literature of Emerging Nations: Modern Hebrew Literature in Translation (5 credits)
MW 2:30-4:20
Instructor: Naomi Sokoloff
Hebrew has had a remarkable history in the past 150 years, as it underwent a startling revitalization. A vehicle of expression for persecuted Jews in Europe in the 19th century, Hebrew literature contributed to the inception of Jewish nationalist movements and played a major role in the shaping of modern Jewish identity.
Following the establishment of the State of Israel, this literature has served as a central pillar of majority culture but also as an instrument of protest. It has voiced the experiences of Jewish refugees from the Middle East, of Palestinian Arabs, of Ethiopian Israelis, of guest workers, and of other minority groups. Hebrew authors and poets have also made important contributions to American writing. Learning about Hebrew literature can foster understanding of language revivals, contested nationalisms, cultures in contact, relations between highbrow and popular culture, and debates regarding gender and nation. Offered jointly with Comp.
Lit 323A.

NEAR E 330 – Colonialism, Nationalism and the Modern Arabic Novel (5 credits)
